

DERO's Rankings Report

If there is one thing I can say with confidence so far, it's that you really can't count anybody out at this point in the season. It's wild to think that everyone in the league is within 2 games of first place (and last place). Teams who stumbled out of the gate like My Ball Zach Ertz and Can Only Go Up, are now building winning streaks that have pulled them right back into the thick of things. PGill has stumbled back to .500 even though they nearly have a 100 point lead in scoring on the season. The Wildcard Rankings of the week look at who's been involved in the most close games and who's been involved in the most blowouts. Some surprises arose from this investigation. Players To Be Named Later has been involved in over half of the league's close games. Conversely, My Ball Zach Ertz has been involved in the most blowouts, but their record in these games is a bit surprising considering how they started. It'll be interesting to see how this week shakes out. If things go exactly right, everyone could be within one game of first place going into week 8.

Clubby League Week 6 Power Rankings

1. PGill (339.118 ranking pts; 3-3 record; 0 rankings change)

- Pat has been a victim of the volatility in fantasy football. The point totals that have beaten him so far are 146.08, 155.02, and 157.52. Those are some absurd totals considering what other teams have gotten victories from. He leads the league in all measure metrics in this power ranking. All of the underlying numbers are there for this team, but it just hasn't happened yet. We'll see if the misfortune continues or if things finally start to roll his way.

2. Caseys Dad (305.427; 2-4; +1)

- This is an interesting ranking because Jaylen is absolutely decimated at running back. He got a total of 2.3 fantasy points from both of his running backs combined last week. Outside of that his roster is solid, but his running backs may lead to his team's downfall. I don't see the ranking holding unless he finds some magic potion to solve his running back situation. His matchup against Markakis' Anaconda might be as close to a must win game as it gets this early in the season.

3. Jeremy (304.182; 4-2; -1)

- A tough outing for Jeremy has set his team back a little. He has seen some drops to his rankings on all fronts. His team is now third in scoring and fifth in manager efficiency. His process has gotten him this far, but he'll be looking to get back on track against a hot team in My Ball Zach Ertz.

4. The Stache (301.852; 3-3; +4)

- Casey's team answered the bell this week. Even though he still sits at the bottom of the league in manager efficiency rankings, he took a big step forward. The Stache is the biggest riser in the overall rankings. Casey now sits second in scoring and sixth in strength of schedule. It'll be interesting to see if he can keep it going against The Human CentIpad.

5. Players To Be Named Later (298.351; 3-3; -1)

- It's wild to think that of this team's six games, five of them have been decided by ten points or less. Brandon has been the most active manager in the league with the most roster transactions. Maybe this team inconsistency lies in the fact they have yet to settle on a QB or that they have been very injury riddled thus far. After this week, Brandon will have started five different QBs in seven games. He might be the mad scientist of the league, or the guy completely over managing his team, but as the saying goes, winning does solve everything.

6. My Ball Zach Ertz (293.791; 3-3; 0)

- I think I mislabeled the hottest team in the league last week. Christian's team is that team right now. He has climbed back from an 0-3 hole to get back to 3-3. My Ball Zach Ertz is blowing teams out and is absolutely rolling right now. He is the biggest climber in manager efficiency passing half of the league to get to the number 3 spot. Opponents beware, all of his wins have been classified as blowouts.

7. The Human CentIpad (291.228; 2-4; -2)

- Average was not good enough for Isaac's team. They must have taken that personally because they just tanked their ranking with last week's performance. He now sits ninth in scoring and eighth in manager efficiency. Things are not looking too bright right now, but he has an opportunity to change the narrative against a tough team in The Stache who just put up 157 points last week.

8. Can Only Go Up (290.643; 2-4; +1)

- Tino is continuing to build with his second straight win. He sits in the middle of the pack for manager efficiency, and his schedule is starting to lighten up. He continues to build and might be a team to watch the rest of the season. This week's matchup against Players To Be Named Later could finally get him out of the cellar.

9. Mean Machine (289.004; 4-2; -2)

- o Tony keeps finding ways to win. That's really all you can say about his record. He has far and away had the easiest schedule. His team has faced 100 less points than league average and just under 200 points less than Pat, who has faced the hardest schedule thus far. This week's matchup will be a real tell in whether he is a contender or a pretender. He plays the aforementioned PGill, but a win could cement him at the top of the league.

10. Markakis' Anaconda (286.403; 4-2; 0)

- o Jordan's team suffered his second loss of the season. He had two players in his starting lineup that put up zeroes in a game where he lost by less than 10 points. That has to hurt. He still sits in the bottom half of the league in all tracked metrics. This might be the week to finally make a roster move or he may be in trouble. He faces off against Caseys Dad to see who's roster holes are smaller.

Ranking points are not points scored but is a mathematical formula using normalized points scored, points against, and coaching efficiency.
